SALMON FISHING IN THE LEWS.

Quickly the rod is put together by the lis-A DEFENCE OF RESORTING TO THE som fingered Donul, who, as he hands it back, remarks that its eighteen feet of seasoned stuff makes just the thing that's wanted. Much against our prejudices, he is allowed to have his way, and put on a "bob," "a silver squire," a smaller fly than the The leading contributed article in this "butcher," which goes upon the tail on cutting out a prize from under a battery. Gaelic benediction from them both, out flice salmon flashes his silver side well out of the water ere he sinks with the deceptive morsel. A chick of the wheel, a whire as the line goes out, and we know that a good fish is fast. In an instant the rod is bent as he gets the butt, and the line -- taut, as it may safely be-cuts the hissing water like a kuife as he rushes down the loch, and takes out forty yards of line. Turning like a game of his once more; but as he sinks and When was man earth the growle rushes off our hearts beat freely again as cess, but, as in other warfare, failing, it involved a quicker probability of defeat, for while the tackle held we felt now that the chances were against him. But a fresh. strong salmon of his weight is not to be trifled with, and it was only after several determined rushes and saltatory efforts, which made us tremble for his capture, that he began to tire, and foot by foot he and the boat were cautiously brought together At last. with a sigh of mingled pleasure, relief, and regret, our first salmon of the Lews was in But who are a backer are asserted at the meshes of Donail's landing-net, but not fat --- thick m girth, the very pink of condition, his glistening scales gave off such hues of
